Overture

A new year has begun at Mary Baldwin College with a record enrollment, and the classrooms are alive again with our traditional, PEG, and Adult Degree Program students. But summer was no vacation for the College, since our summer programs were better than ever and well attended. More on this in the pages which follow.

And what better way to begin the new volume year of The Mary Baldwin Magazine than to feature articles on creativity from three of our faculty? We think the theme is appropriate to the College, and to the magazine. Notice some "creative" changes in the design? We are responding to your suggestions.

We also have had some staffing changes. Crista Cabe, the College's new Executive Director of Alumnae Activities, now heads up the Editorial Advisory Board. Genie Addleton joins the College Relations staff and becomes our new managing editor. Your editor stays the same, even though this year he assumes responsibility for College Development as well as College Relations.

Finally, you hold in your hands a thick magazine because its pages also contain the Honor Roll of donors to last year's record Annual Fund. This is good news, indeed, and all our friends deserve publicity through our pages. Thanks to all of you.

This issue of the magazine is the first of three to come during our second volume year. We have changed the frequency of the magazine in order to cut huge costs, yes, but also to allow more time to prepare even better magazines than before. So, do not look for four issues this year — the mail carrier is not asleep — but also do not feel disappointed. We have some other new publications coming your way soon, as the College continues to strive to communicate better with all its friends.

Grab a chair and relax. Your next few hours will be enjoyable!

President's Message

As all of our readers are aware, we try, appropriately I think, in this alumnae magazine to focus on the people who have made and who make Mary Baldwin a special place to remember and to continue to support. Indeed, you will recall that we have given highlight to outstanding influential persons such as Dr. and Mrs. Grafton. Founders' Day, traditionally held in October, reminds me again that the College lives in our mind and hearts through the influence of fine professors, able staff, and close friendships.

A specific reminder came to my attention in a letter from Mrs. Edmund D. Campbell, now Vice-President for Community Affairs at WETA Television 26 in Washington, D.C. Some of you will remember her as Elizabeth Pfohl and that she was Dean of the College when young Martha Stackhouse arrived at Mary Baldwin. I am sure Mrs. Campbell would not mind my quoting from her letter:

I have known her [Martha Grafton] intimately for 58 years and introduced her to Edmund Campbell, who became my husband. She and Tom were our confidants at the college during our courting days.

My husband, a Washington lawyer, served on the Mary Baldwin College Board of Trustees from 1943-1972, with positions as General Counsel and Chairman of the Board. When we say that the Graftons are a truly rare couple we know whereof we speak. Without their unique contributions to the college during the 79 years of their combined service, Mary Baldwin could not possibly have become the great institution it is today. In fact, my husband says that without Martha's unshakable faith and wise leadership during some of the most trying years of MBC history, when other similar institutions were closing their doors, Mary Baldwin would not have survived. My husband and I agree that Martha possesses and has always exhibited a rare combination of traits: firmness, sensitivity, acumen, breadth of vision and wisdom.

As the years have gone by we have come to recognize and appreciate even more fully than we had in the past the unusual talents that have enabled Tom Grafton also to serve the college so well. Former students have told us of his excellence as a teacher, and it is quite something to be such an able journeyman in teaching the many subjects which from time to time were thrown his way. He, too, is a person of unswerving faith, a great person to know.

Rufus Bailey
First Founder of Mary Baldwin College

Incidentally, both Graftons have an unusual recall of the names and faces of former students and faculty; in fact, Tom's memory on almost any subject is prodigious enough to rank him among the world's 'greats.'

We have just returned from an overnight rendezvous with the Graftons at Skyland, in the Shenandoah National Park, an annual event for the four of us. They have again inspired us — just as together they have inspired others for more than a half century.

I must add, too, what is an entirely superfluous remark: Mr. and Mrs. Edmund D. Campbell have likewise been remarkable influences for good at Mary Baldwin and continue to exert influence and example. A few weeks ago, I had the pleasure of spending part of an evening with them in Washington, D.C., and was reminded once more of the heritage they helped to create and from which those of us who study and work at the College now benefit.

The Graftons, the Campbells, and many more persons of like intellect, dedication, and dignity are truly the founders we celebrate in October, 1988, on Founders' Day. They were guardians of the traditions and philosophies established by Rufus Bailey and Mary Julia Baldwin herself, and they remind us of our present task of sustaining and strengthening that precious heritage.

Elizabeth Pfohl

Longtime friends of Mary Baldwin College, Edmund D. and Elizabeth Pfohl Campbell. Mr. Campbell is the great-grandson of Rufus Bailey; Mrs. Campbell served as Dean of the College.

PHILOSOPHICAL

RECONCEPTUALIZATION

OF CREATIVITY

reativity is often considered a psychological subject, an observed human phenomenon described in terms of irrational processes of thought, independent originality, and individual achievement. Yet creativity is also a concept, an idea which influences our descriptions of what it means to be "creative." By bringing a philosophical perspective to this psychological subject, we can critically analyze some of the assumptions and implications inherent in our ideas about creativity. Is it possible that our traditional concept of creativity needlessly restricts our ability to recognize and enhance creative activity? Should we think about creativity in new and enriching ways?

As a concept creativity has its origins in the theological idea of The Creation. Historically we know that "creativity" was solely God's ex nihilo prerogative because the primary definition of "creativity" was "to bring forth into being out of nothing." Language conventions dictated that while God creates, people simply duplicate. It wasn't until after 1933 that the Oxford English Dictionary permitted a secondary definition of "creativity" as a human attribute, and even then it was defined "with complementary extension from the Divine Agent" as "having the quality of creating." The idea of human creativity was dependent, for its conceptual content, on the idea of divine creativity. People became co-creator with God in a way that appropriated a paradoxical twist: they began to exercise a human ability that seemed superhuman.

" 'Tis wise to learn; 'tis Godlike to create," asserts J.G. Saxe. But what does this mean? Maybe people conflate procreation and creation, thinking that since they do one then they also do the other. We remember Socrates taught that people can have creative minds as well as creative bodies. Maybe the idea's appeal accounts for why its weakness was camouflaged for two thousand years. Then along comes Sheridan who spoofs the obvious flaw in Socrates' analogy between creation and procreation by quipping "The imagination becomes suspicious of its offspring, and doubts whether it has created or adopted." Presumably God cannot borrow or steal anything as he creates out of nothing. How ver, since artists create through the cooperative contributions of other people and existing materials, they cannot be assured that the resulting product is really their own. Despite this debunk-ing, the link between divine creativity and human creativity survived on another conceptual level. On this more sophisticated level, "human creativity" implies that people meet criteria of creativity which are more abstract than those provided by the concrete case of procreativity.

However, abstract theological ideas were still present to influence peoples' thinking about the criteria of creativity. So when people believe it is oddlike to create, they are not referring to the ological phenomenon of procreation or the psychological explanation of creativity. In a common sense way they are expressing confidence that people do share "creativity" with the God defined in Christianity.

What is the description of this creative God?
God is the solitary, infinitely capable Source.
Creation issues forth from God's special power of pure origination. Without the helpful guide of any prior rules, God establishes rules and order.
God is the One solely accountable for His creation, God freely produces the universe without being affected by any outside influences. Only God controls the creative outcome. Although the ultimate mystery of creation defies rational understanding, God's creative action is remarkable for His generosity and benevolence.

Given this idea of a Creator, we can appreciate why we think of a Creative Person as a unique and solitary individual who achieves initial success within the isolation of the studio. The artist is adept at a mysterious process which cannot be fully explained, although it can be attributed to her extraordinary ability to produce original and novel works. Drawing on inner sources of inspiration, the Creative Person frees herself from the conformity to rules or outside determining factors. Her creative work seems to come out of nowhere, but it is special and valuable. Such strong correlations prompt us to conjecture that the idea of a Creating God has influenced our idea of a Creative Person.

However, as we might suspect, translating the divine into the human has detrimental implications. By assuming sole authorship in creation, we unwittingly emphasize the value of the individual over the value of the contributing human community. And as much as we promote psychological research into creativity, many of us still hold onto the conviction that, try as we might, we will never be able to explain the truly essential, mysterious qualities of creativity. This lack of rational accountability, paired with the complete freedom of personal originality, grants individuals a "creative" license which can become, in turn, a destructive cultural mistake. By uncritically accepting some of the popular assumptions of creativity, we inadvertently support the values of a Single Locus of Control, Rare Talent, Individual Greatness, and Unlimited Personal Power. According to the American critic Pauline Kael, "What people think is creativity is simply the excitement of success, the exhilaration of power. . . Did anyone guess or foresee what narcissistic confidence this generation would develop in banal creativity?" By thinking it is godlike for us to create, we erroneously promote a skewed notion of creativity which edifies select individuals and inhibits the building of human community. The Romanian artist Horia Bernea warns against this covert, counterproductive vanity when he distinguishes between "creativity" and the more humble form of human innovation: "The artist must understand that he does not create — he materializes," and, to that end, the artist relies upon other people to supply him with the elements he will fashion into art.

Yet the old association between human and divine creativity is still circulating through our culture. In the revolutionary book Beyond God the Father, Mary Daly claims: "It is the creative potential itself in human beings that is the image of God." An ironic variation on this theme is also noted by Arianna Stassinopoulos: "Our current obsession with creativity is the result of our continued striving for immortality in an era when most people no longer believe in an after-life." If Creative People replace the Creative God, then our concept of creativity needs to be reconsidered to adjust for this change. Until we reconceptualize what it means to be humanly creative, we can be misled by what it has meant to be divinely creative.

To begin our reconceptualization of creativity, we can turn to other models of creation which are present in our world tradition. In Aristotle we find the firm belief that creativity can be rationally understood, for Aristotle held that the generative principle of the universe is nous poietikos, poetic-creative reason, not a mysterious God. Rational inquiry is therefore integrated into creative production rather than separated from it. Likewise, to develop reasoning skills is to simultaneously develop your creative potential. Through a receptive exploration and critical examination of the world's traditions, the creative person can begin to correctly assess and innovatively meet culture's current needs. As an artist, scientist, minister or psychologist, the creative person acts on the belief that a rational understanding of past human constructions improves the invention of appropriately new human constructions. "Knowledge is the stuff from which new ideas are made" agrees Roger Van Oech.

Another idea of creativity can be found in the Chinese "Sheng" which relies on the Taoist notion of creation as perpetual rejuvenation. Sheng is not the same as creativity in the Western sense because it is not a originating event as much as it is a two-fold dynamic process of maintenance and renewal. The Chinese scholar Thaddeus Hang translates Sheng as "Good change: ever-renovating/producing" to emphasize the continuing positive value of creativity. This value is generalized beyond the contribution of the mere individual in the form of either a personified God or a artistic genius. Creativity is less specific because the creator is indistinguishable from the creativity which sustains creation. Instead of identifying the separable components of Creative Process, and Creative Product as we tend to assume in the Western tradition, the Taoists identify only the interanimating whole of Creative Process/Creation. As a generative activity, Sheng passes through the individual human groups, and non-human elements within our natural environment. So instead of simply presupposing the One Artist as the creative matrix, Taoists view the Entire Interrelationship between the artist and her surroundings as the creative matrix. When the painter Grace Hartigan observes "There's a time when what you're creating and the environment you're creating it in come together," she is noting a similar point although Taoists would hold that they were never separated in the first place.

If we recognize that our total surrounding form the basis for our creative response, then we can emphasize the importance of community for the individual's creative expression. "Creativity is a function of the collective life of an entire society" writes Joseph Margolis. Creativity is not simply a function of the individual, nor a sanction of personal aggrandizement. Rather than foregrounding original talent or individual achievement, "Creativity must awaken everyone's consciousness to all humans," claims Robert Ginsberg. To be creative is to extend our awareness into perspectives that are not currently our own. Opening up this conceptual side of creativity affirms the value of human interrelatedness and interaction. It also bridges the aesthetic with the ethical: before we can actualize the good in human community, we have to be able to imagine the possible good. The suggestion that creativity can join together the aesthetic and ethical may surprise us, but it shouldn't: the concern for the good is apparent in both the Christian and Chinese concepts of creation. Repeatedly a Genesis narrative tells us how God looked out upon His creation and saw it was good. "Good change" is also the primary definition of Sheng. In both traditions creation is considered constructive, valuable, and fitting. Our reconceptualization of creativity should likewise be constructive, valuable, and fitting.

Our renewed concept of creativity can incorporate a human-heartedness and a human-thoughtfulness. We can be attentive to the importance of a caring response so that being response-able can become a precondition for being creative. By replacing the idea of talent with the idea of response-ability, we change the focus of our description. Talent's sense of individual possession, extraordinary ability, and privileged gifted-ness is replaced by response-ability's sense of shared interchange, ordinary ability, and mutual giving-ness. Participation in creative action would then be possible for all people, not just a select few.

In answering and co-authoring the world we all share with others, we can rejuvenate and transform many life projects. As John Updike observes, "Creativity is a plus name for regular activity... Any activity becomes creative when the doer cares about doing it right, or better." The response-ability to do something better implies that there is a potential improvement waiting to be discovered in the future. Because creativity offers us the freedom to turn from the limitations of the present to the possibilities of the future, Alfred North Whitehead provocatively states, "Present creativity flows to us from the future." Creativity has more than the present orientation of production: it also has the future orientations of growth, generation, and contribution.

Anticipating the future is a project of education. When we take on the educational work of developing creative response-ability, we help each other seriously question the nature of human experience, the basis of human value, and the process of community building. We consider the nearly paralyzing possibility that we are not free and cannot positively affect our world. We overcome our doubt. With admitted difficulty

*Janaan Hashim and Ingrid Erickson, both members of the class of 1989, are responsible for marketing a videotape to educate college students about AIDS. we try to support the life-long task of learning to discern what is good. Together we evaluate the notions of power, control, privilege, and exclusion. We restore receptivity, contribute to mutual cooperation, and frequently reaffirm our will to change and be changed. In unexpected ways we nurture and encourage each other. And throughout it all we are happy with the vitality we feel.

In reconsidering the concept of creativity, we have shifted away from the terms of irrational processes of thought, independent originality, and individual achievement. Our move has been to explore the alternatives of rational inquiry, interdependent response-ability, and the place of all people within the creative community — a composite diversity whose significant achievements occur within dynamic and evolving traditions.

With all its psychological, theological, social and educational aspects, creativity is a most complex concept. In many ways creativity is a diagnostic concept: it indicates how we think about ourselves and our world. In other ways creativity is a prescriptive concept: it tells us how to value ourselves and our world. To engage our lives as creative challenges we need to understand what we hope to mean by creativity. So in order to envision the best of what we might become, we should continue to rethink creativity in artful and evocative ways.

WHAT IS CREATIVITY?

by James D. Lott

When I was in high school, the sophomore class gave a play. I cannot remember the title, and I can remember very little about the plot. I do recall that it was about an odd family going on a picnic, and I also recall that all the characters had eccentricities which established them both as types (cheerleader and nervous mother, for instance) and as foils for each other. We found the play hilarious — primarily, I think, because it showed us in exaggerated form images of ourselves and of people around us. Admittedly, we were not a terribly sophisticated audience, but we did have a keen eye for the obvious.

I mention this play because the one thing I remember clearly about it is the character of the Poet. He was everyone's stereotypical creative artist: highly aesthetic in manner and dress (a beret, of course, and a blouse-like shirt) and incredibly inept in the intense social situation provided by the picnic, except when he took center stage (literally) to recite his own verse. The verse, like the poet, was what we all expected. It was full of moons and birds and trees and wine and the sounds of distant violins, and he recited it all in a voice which hovered on the edge of tears. It surprised none of us that he did not end up with the cheerleader, though I seem to recall that the nervous mother thought he was nice.

As I began to think about creativity and the arts (particularly literature) for this article, the poet in that play came to mind. I think in a dopey way he represents our social consensus about the creative artist. Impractical, concerned with nature not for itself (as a scientist would be) but as it affects his extremely sensitive poetic antennae, the artist is a colorful something floating from one ecstatic experience to another: a human butterfly. Beautiful sometimes, but of very little use.

Beyond caricature, the image of the poet as dreamer has a long and even respectable history in Western thought. (I shall, by the way, be using the terms "poet," "artist," and "writer" interchangeably.) Plato, no friend to poets, describes in the Ion the way the poet enters a mad frenzy to write poetry, and in the Phaedrus he argues that the poet in the act of creation is possessed by the power of the Muse and rendered mad. (So mad, in fact, is the poet that after the creative fit has departed, he can't tell what he himself means in his poem and needs a critic to inform him.) Plato insists that the highest human endeavor is the search for truth, but he also insists that the way to truth is reason and that the poet's irrational ecstasy renders him inferior to the philosopher. Little wonder that Plato's great work The Republic banishes poets from the perfect political state.

In Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream Theseus — obviously a student of Plato even on his wedding night — observes to his bride Hippolyta that "the lunatic, the lover, and the poet Are of imagination all compact." The major difference among them is in the object of their imaginations: the madman sees devils where there are none, the lover sees a beautiful woman in a hag (one wonders how Hippolyta reacts to that characterization of the lover given by he rand-new husband), and the poet sees "forms of things unknown" and "turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing/ A local habitation and a name." A minor difference between the poet and the other two lunatics is that the poet writes all down.

This image of poet/artist as ecstatic dreamer, even of madman, can be either positive or negative depending on whether one sees the poet/artist as trying to imitate what exists in nature or as creating something not in nature. Plato assumes that the poet imitates what exists already and that poetic inspiration blurs the poet's vision of reality. Even if the poet does manage to imitate correctly, what is imitated is merely something in the physical world, and the physical world, in Plato's view, is itself a mere copy of reality, which exists in the eternal form of things, not in the things themselves. Shakespeare (or at least Theseus) assumes that the poetic imagination causes the poet to see what is not and that the poet is in the business of seeing and presenting illusion. (Note that Theseus uses the term "imagination" in the sense of the fanciful, the imaginary.")

I am oversimplifying, of course, but whether one accepts Plato or Theseus, there is a problem: neither art reflects reality in some way ("art imitates Nature," to use the traditional formula) and does it badly (as in Plato) or art has no relationship to Nature at all (as in Theseus).

Thinkers at least as early as Aristotle recognized this problem and — to solve it — posited a different image of the artist and the artistic endeavor. In fact, if one's assumption is that the poet/artist imitates or "mimics" Nature — rather than creating something wholly original and unique — and if one sees mimesis as something positive, then a different image of the artist becomes necessary: the artist as maker, or artisan, who knows and follows the rules.

In contrast to Plato's comments on art and poetry, Aristotle's Poetics and Horace's Art of Poetry are written on the assumption that artistic works reflect a reality perceivable to everyone and that there are certain guidelines which an artist/poet should follow if the artistic imitation of reality is to be adequate. Horace's famous poem on poetry, for instance, begins by describing an imaginary painting which depicts a bizarre figure: a human head, the neck of a horse, the plumage of a bird, and the tail of a fish. As quickly as he describes it, Horace says that of course such a wild concoction would be laughable and that there are simple rules to prevent such excesses. (One wonders what Horace would say after a quick trot through a museum of modern art.)

For students of English literature, the two attitudes — the artist as "maker" and the artist as inspired genius — may be exemplified in the contrast between the poets of the 18th century and those of the Romantic period.

In Alexander Pope's Essay on Criticism, for instance, the assumption is that literature (like all art) derives from "Nature" and imitates it. The most famous couplet from the poem insists that the creation of something absolutely new is probably impossible (and, even if possible, undesirable): "True Wit is Nature to advantage dressed,/ What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed." Given that assumption, Pope can provide a series of rules which the writer as technician can follow (avoid extremes, make the parts consonant with the whole, follow the example of the ancient writers, and so forth).

In contrast, writers of the Romantic period describe poetry as something other than the imitation of Nature and depict the poet as something distinctly superior to a craftsman who works hard to make good copies of nature. Poetry, according to Wordsworth, is "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feeling." Instead of explaining rules, Wordsworth describes the experience whereby the poet remembers past feelings and, in a state of tranquillity, summons those feelings up again: poetry results not from technique but from emotion and memory. Wordsworth's friend Coleridge praises the individual vision — as opposed to the 18th century ideal of "what oft was thought" by all intelligent people — and the kind of originality which comes not from craft but from the "synthetic [that is, synthesizing] and magical power to which...[we] exclusively appropriate the name of Imagination." Shelley sees the poetic spirit, because it is truly inspired by something outside itself, as superior to any other mode of perception: "The mind in creation is as a fading coal, which some invisible influence, like an inconstant wind, awakens to transitory brightness."

Ironically, the Romantics, Shelley particularly, make use of Plato's portrait of the poet as inspired while rejecting Plato's insistence that to be inspired in this way is bad, or at least inferior to reason as a way of understanding.

If the Platonic/Romantic image of the artist is the source of the portrayal of "poet as dreamy wimp" in my high school play, the Aristotelian/Neo-Classical image of the artist as technician has given us myths of the hard worker. Interestingly enough, these myths tend not to be about art and poetry, but about business (Horatio Alger) and science/technology (Thomas Edison's "Genius is  $\frac{1}{10}$  inspiration and  $\frac{9}{10}$  perspiration.").

 here are in our thinking about the artist/writer, therefore, two extremes, two ends of a spectrum: the dreamer whose imagination creates worlds unknown to ordinary people and the artisan whose hard work and adherence to the rules result in paintings, poems, or stories which the rest of us recognize as "true to reality."

Student writers, and beginning writers in general, typically are schizophrenic in their attitudes towards the two extremes. As artists themselves they tend to identify with the "dreamer" end of the scale. Poems and stories come to them only in inspired moments — many young writers talk about their inability to write when they are not "in the mood" — and the first version of the poem or story is therefore sacred. Any revision makes it somehow less pure, less true to the original inspiration. Yet the same writer, when he or she reads a poem or story, may demand the kind of clarity which — in most cases — only extensive revision can bring. This is understandable, for we all are much more patient with our own mental fuzziness than with that of our spouses, children, or colleagues. What happens in the development of writers — when, in fact, development occurs — is that they gain the ability to read their own works as others would read them. When this happens, the writer begins to find revision more palatable: He or she, in fact, moves from one artistic self-image to another.

I have drawn the contrast between the two images of the artist in bold strokes to emphasize the differences. Actually, there has always been in the "dreamer" image at least a suspicion that creating art requires work, and there has always been in the "artisan" image the implication that hard work without inspiration results in correctness without life. Nevertheless, every age, in its thinking about creativity and art, has moved to one side or the other of the spectrum.

Historical perspective tends to simplify things for us: Looking back over a couple of thousand years gives us the sense that there is a pattern and that we can perceive it. When we look at our own times, however, issues become much more complicated, partly because there is so much more going on that we are aware of. What artists thought 100 years ago is relatively easy to understand because we no longer remember 99% of it; what artists think today is not so easily subject to summary or categorizing.

Having said that, however, I'd like to try a contemporary response to the question I have been examining historically: what is creativity?

I think most artists/writers would agree that art reflects reality but that the artist's "creativity" lies in his or her power to break down reality and reconstruct it. Art is neither pure fabrication nor pure imitation; it is both.

Perhaps the most important change which has taken place in our self-understanding over the past 100 years is our increased awareness and knowledge of our individual internal realities. It does not mean that no one before the 20th century recognized the power of our minds and emotions to color and alter our perception of the world around us. The intensity of our introspection, our concern with our inner selves, is nevertheless part of the modern ethos. One does not have to be a Freudian to understand this major intellectual and cultural shift in perspective. Artists and writers very rarely talk today about "imitating reality" because "reality" for 20th century men and women is different from the "reality" assumed by Plato, Aristotle, Shakespeare, and Wordsworth.

Because reality has moved inward, artists can no longer assume that there is an objective reality which is the same to everyone. The question I have asked: the artist depicting reality? no longer, therefore, has any meaning (or at least it no longer has the meaning which earlier thinkers assumed it had). Writers of fiction, poets, and visual artists alike show us a "reality" filtered through and changed their individual and necessarily subjective perceptions. It is even true of some artists that what is being imitated is the reality of their own subjectivity, images of their minds with little reference to the external world.

I should admit here that in one way — in the visual arts at least — it is possible to talk about creativity which is non-imitative. If we can see Picasso as a painter who breaks down reality and — as a Cubist — reconstructs it in terms of shapes, we might think of the works of Jackson Pollock in contrast as deriving their excitement from a purely “painterly” relationship of colors which refer to nothing outside themselves and therefore “mean” nothing; that what it is to be “non-representational.”

With this one exception, the modern artist/writer does “imitate reality,” though the reality imitated is both the thing perceived and the act of perception.

I wish to define creativity, then, as the act of perceiving which breaks down and reconstructs reality. I also wish to argue that it occurs through the power of metaphor.

Towards the conclusion of his Poetics, Aristotle writes, almost off-handedly, . . . “the greatest thing by far is to have a command of metaphor. This alone cannot be imparted by another; it is the mark of genius — for to make good metaphors implies an eye for resemblances” (XXII, 9, Archer’s translation).

Anyone who has had a class in literature knows that metaphor compares two unlikes. Typically, we discuss metaphor on the verbal level alone, and we learn to associate it with poetry: in fact, we often assume that metaphorical language is one of the elements separating “poetic” language from “real” language. This, I shall try to demonstrate, a false and misleading assumption which unnecessarily restricts our understanding of metaphor, and of creativity.

“There’s not a budding boy or girl this day/ But got up and gone to bring in May”: so the 17th century poet Robert Herrick, in Corinna’s Going a-Maying, describes the youth who are “Maying” (gathering May flowers) as themselves “budding,” and thus establishes the similarity between them and the flowers. “Sudden a thought came like a full-blown rose,/ Flushing his brow, and in his pained heart/ Made purple out”: so Keats describes the agony of the frustrated lover Porphyro in The Eve of St. Agnes by associating the color of the rose not only with the visible redness of his brow but with the hidden “purple riot” of his heart. For Emily Dickinson, the snake is “A narrow Fellow in the Grass”; for Wordsworth, the “winds that will be howling” are in the quiet evening “up-gathered now like sleeping flowers”; for W.H. Auden, the inevitable passage of time is heard as "The glacier knocks in the cupboard, / The desert sighs in the bed."

Outlets for creativity abound at Mary Baldwin College. Here directors of student productions - all Mary Baldwin students - take their turns on stage.

Poetic metaphor, then, shows us what exists, but it does so by connecting "what exists" to something else which also exists and thus creating a new reality. Metaphor, in other words, fuses two realities to create a third.

Beyond poetry, our language, our power to name and therefore to know, is metaphor: most words are, at root, images, and most of our concepts are metaphors connecting abstractions with the concrete world from which we cannot escape. The sentence I have just written, for instance, seems abstract but actually uses metaphors of space ("Beyond poetry"), nurturance and origin ("at root"), and imprisonment ("from which we cannot escape"). It is even possible to argue that there could be no connection between the physical world and our mental worlds without metaphor, that language itself is a metaphor for reality.

In an even more general sense, however, metaphor may be thought of as the connecting power of the mind, the mental ability to see that one thing is like another. It is, therefore, the ability to catch resemblances among the past, the present, and the future; between what we have known and what we could have known; between the "real" and the "imagined."

I want to try to make this clear, and I hope I'll be forgiven for drawing on my own experience as a writer to do so.

When I was a child, I lived in a town in which there was a river crossed by a train trestle, a place we generally had sense enough to stay away from. Once, though, at the end of a long hike on a hot day, some friends and I decided to walk across it so we could get home quicker. Just as we hopped off the end of the thing, we heard a train coming, and we shivered in the realization that we could have been caught in the middle: it did have a walkway, but we were all convinced, as we watched the train chug by, that, had we not made it across, we would have been shaken off by the vibrations. Many years later, I wrote a story called "Sunday with the World at War," about a little boy during World War II who experiences "grown-up" fright for the first time in his life. As I worked on that story, the train trestle from my childhood kept getting in my mind, and I finally saw the connection between the boy's fear and the trestle. In the story, the boy finds he cannot set foot on the trestle, and his father has to come across it to lead him home. Now, I am not the boy in the story, and the trestle in my childhood is not the trestle in the story (though they look alike in my mind). In the story, the reality of the "real" trestle is broke down and reconstructed to become a different reality: the "real" trestle and the "imaginary" trestle have a metaphorical relationship which creates that new reality.

If we think of metaphor as the power to break down and reconstruct reality by seeing resemblance and making connections, then it gives us a way to think about creativity which goes beyond the dichotomies of "originality/imitation" which I described at the beginning.

What metaphor does is paradoxical: it shows us what we know and what we have not known, and it does both at the same time. It gives us the pleasure of recognition and the shock of the new simultaneously. To make metaphor, then, is in the largest sense to recognize that two things — formerly perceived as separate, quite likely never even thought of together — are alike in certain ways. And when that likeness is established, nothing is the same; reality has been altered. Creativity is the power to move from the known into the unknown through metaphor and thus to perceive and create reality at the same time.

The unfortunate Poet in my high school play was all clothing and manner: he was a slave to the stereotype which we had in our minds and which he represented. He aped reality (or the consensus which passed for reality), and he confirmed our prejudices about what the poet is. He had both feet firmly planted in the known. The creative person — metaphorically speaking — stands always with one foot in the known. The other foot — sometimes tentatively, sometimes wildly — is always jutting forward into the unknown. The Poet in the play merely seemed crazy; the creative person — remember my metaphor — is truly unbalanced.

*James D. Lott, Dean of the College and Professor of English, came to Mary Baldwin in 1964. Dr. Lott earned a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Wisconsin. Consider a standard study in the educational psychology of the relationship between humor and creativity: one group of students watches a comic film while a second group watches an informational film. Afterward, both groups are given a "creativity" task, such as elaborating a series of diamond shapes into pictures or making up as many sentences as they can think of which contain two given words. Students who have viewed the humorous film will come up with more elaborations, and more of their elaborations will be judged to be creative than their peers who watched the informational film.

What's going on here?

The plain answer is that we don't know for sure. Both creativity and humor are troublesome areas in the study of education. In both areas there has been much more speculation than good research, and the speculation on both topics runs the whole gamut. Some authors, for example, believe that individual differences in these abilities are innate — we either are lucky enough to be born with a sense of humor or without that quality we call creativity, in the same way we are destined to be blonde or brunette, or we are not; others believe that being funny or creative is entirely a matter of learning. Many writers (and most teachers) believe that while you may be naturally funny or naturally creative, we can help nature along, just as Clairol can help us overcome the limitations of innate hair color.

Creativity is generally regarded as a valuable skill. We apply the label "creative" to people not only as a compliment, but there is little agreement on what we mean by it. Psychologists have defined creativity in terms of two interrelated skills: the ability to produce a lot of ideas (fluency) and the ability to produce rare, unusual, or even sometimes bizarre ideas (infrequency). If a person just has a lot of ideas, we might call that person "smart," or even "brilliant," but we probably wouldn't want to call her "creative." If a person only had a unique idea rarely (like once every other decade), we also might not be willing to label her "creative" (although in areas such as pure science, medicine, or mathematics, two or three unique contributions in a lifetime might be exceptional).

There is a further quality that is often added to this list of requirements for the designation of

CREATIVITY, HUMOR, AND LEARNING

by Ashton D. Trice

creativity: the ideas have to be useful, sane, or understandable. People who perform well on standard assessments of creativity are much more likely to develop psychosis than noncreative people. Schizophrenia is often associated with a "flight of ideas," and manic depressives and paranoiacs make highly infrequent responses. The student who makes a lot of unusual responses is often called "stupid," or — and this might be of interest — be said to be "clowning around."

Being funny is not always so valued. Although virtually everyone will say that they have a "sense of humor," most everyone will want to put limitations on being funny. In our research during the 1988 Spring semester at Mary Baldwin College, we surveyed students and community members concerning what they found funny, and what they did not consider appropriate occasions or topics for humor. Every person in our survey said there were some things that should not be the topic of jokes or some occasions when humor was inappropriate. Of interest here, was the stark split on humor in the classroom. About a fourth of the students surveyed indicated that they very much enjoyed humor from their professors, while another fourth indicated that they found it very inappropriate for a teacher to tell jokes either unrelated to the content of the course or about the subject matter. Evaluation of textbooks indicates that while a given student may "like" textbooks with humor in them better than those which are entirely serious, a substantial proportion of students rate humorous textbooks less scholarly than those without humor.

etting back to the original example, we need to ask three questions: why would a humorous experience lead to more creative responses; how can humor be introduced into the curriculum to produce creative responses by students and thereby meet our educational goals; and, finally, what "real world" pay-offs are there for teaching kids to be either funny or creative? I think in a very real way the answers to these questions are the same.

I would like to make two assumptions about creativity: 1) All of us are at least occasionally creative, and 2) Because most of us are not very creative, when we encounter a student (or a daughter or son or a fellow worker) who's doing something unusual, we don't really know what to make of what he or she is doing. We ask ourselves, "Are they being creative or are they being silly?" (Actually, they might be both!) Let's think through a few examples:

One day in geometry class, our teacher asks us to prove the Pythagorean Theorem. Let's say we forget the elegant, standard, seven-step proof, but we think through the problem from another perspective, and arrive at the proof after a laborious 21 steps. What happens? We get a "C-" for our effort. Perhaps if the teacher had been privy to the processes we went through, he may have at least complimented us on our originality, but in the demands of grading a hundred exams, all he noticed is that we didn't learn the proof he took so much effort in trying to teach us.

Let's say that in a music class we are assigned to write four-part harmony for a hymn tune. We are struck with this impish idea that we should ramble through several key changes on the way to the final "Amen" in the tonic key: we get a big red "F" on the score paper and are required to repeat the exercise, "correctly." Here the teacher was trying to teach the rules of 19th Century harmony, and our class exercise gave no indication that we had mastered the assigned material. Virtually every major composer (and every minor one, no doubt) has had the same experience.

At a marketing staff meeting for an interior design company that caters to traditional tastes, a new member of the firm suggests a zany TV promotional campaign that pokes fun at the company's staid image by featuring a character jumping up and down maniacally on an elegant Chinese Chippendale dining room suite. Eyebrows are elevated, and the meeting turns to a more respectable idea without comment on his idea.

So, you've made a creative response and you've gotten bashed! Unless you are extraordinarily creative (or altogether insensitive to what those around you think), such experiences will probably result in your hiding your creativity the next time you have an occasion to use it. You can't remember the right proof? Leave the question blank. You have an idea in music class; you might write it out, but you hand in the "right" harmonization. You have a goofy idea in a staff meeting; you keep it to yourself. So, what can humor do to improve the situation?

There are three theories about what humor does. The first theory is that humor (and particularly laughter) causes a biological relaxation response. This relaxation response, and other physiological responses (including an analgesic consequence of laughter and even perhaps an enhancement of the immune system) have led to a lot of recent speculation that humor and laughter are therapeutic. This stress reduction ability of humor is why some of us laugh in very troubled times. Perhaps this is why mildly amusing comments at a funeral become hilarious to some people. If you're nervous, tell yourself a joke. I think that the reason after-dinner speakers always start with a joke is not only to relax the members of the audience (who are stressed about the possibility of another boring after-dinner speaker) but also to relax themselves. If students are too stressed to attempt original thinking, a joke or other humorous activity might help them relax enough to tap their creativity.

The second theory is that humor changes our emotional feelings about certain topics; you can't be amused and frightened at the same time. By repeatedly applying humor to a threatening topic, you gradually come to perceive the topic as non-threatening. We exploited the emotion-changing nature of humor in a study of "math anxious" students at MBC who were facing learning a good deal of statistics in general psychology. We assigned some of the anxious students to a section that stressed their basic ability and the easiness of statistics, while others were put in a group that poked fun at the whole process of learning statistics (even the problems were sort of jokes). Those in the humor section scored higher on the final exam, attended more review sessions, and attempted more problems on the final exam than those who were repeatedly told that their ability matched the difficulty of the task. On a more everyday level, by introducing humor into the classroom the teacher signals the student that it's "okay" to express his or her unusual ideas: this is play-time, and nothing really bad will happen if you say (or draw or act out or sing) something that no one expects. [This theory may seem very much like the first theory, but the biological theory only accounts for temporary changes in physical stress, while the emotional theory attempts to account for permanent changes in more complex emotional states.]

The third theory is that humor allows us to think about topics in new ways. The classic example of this approach to humor is the advice to think of a person interviewing you for a job in his underwear: this allows you to think of the interviewer as just another guy, rather than as the powerbroker who holds your entire life in his hands.

Each of these theories would explain why humor allows us to express our "original" thoughts: by reducing stress, changing an inhibiting emotional state to a freeing one, or by changing our normal ways of thinking about a topic, humor allows us to express our novel thoughts—or may actually encourage us to have them. On a more practical level, a teacher who allows you to laugh and joke in class may also be perceived as the kind of teacher who will allow you to express an unusual point of view or to try out a "ridiculous" idea.

Like the people in our survey, most teachers have sacred cows about which they don't want to hear cow jokes, and like most professionals, academics believe that you have to pay your dues before you get to break "the rules." I think that the perception of professors as joyless, funless pedants is as wrong as the image that professors should be clowns performing in order to bring their students into paroxysms of mirth and creativity. As the victim of a Classical education, I feel that, as in all things, the Golden Mean of moderation pertains.

Humor also lets students know that there is some fun, pleasure, or joy in a topic: my least favorite comment from students is "This is boring." Something can't be funny and boring at the same time. Humor helps us get over rough academic times. If the definitions by the children who were the subjects in my dissertation weren't so amusing ("Cats have tails and whiskers. They eat cat food and poop in flower beds."), I might not have finished. Humor is not for every educational occasion; then again, neither is creativity: there is always room for diligent hard work and mastering the wisdom of the past, but there is certainly time for the fun and the new as well.

"Humor is not for every educational occasion. Then again, neither is creativity: There is always room for diligent, hard work and mastering the wisdom of the past. Certainly, though, there is time for the fun and the new, as well."

By using humor, among other means, professors attempt to enhance the creativity of their students, not just so that they become creative students, but so that they also become creative human beings. The college classroom can be a place where every student learns to trust her originality enough to express it, to unlearn all the baggage developed from experiences where friends, parents, teachers, and co-workers have inhibited her original thought by telling her that her ideas aren't "right."

We are certainly living in a time when "right" ideas are not working: raising the drinking age hasn't stemmed the tide of teenage drinking and driving; high-minded sex education hasn't broken the back of AIDS; serious legislation has not stemmed the thinning of the ozone; a six-year dose of "trickle-down" economics didn't solve the balance of payment problem. Perhaps it is time for a little foolish, creative thinking on these—and other—matters, that might begin by giving a few college students permission to think crazy thoughts for fifty minutes at a time.

Just Keeping In Touch

Now that fall is here, my days seem to be busier and busier...and Thanksgiving and Christmas are just around the corner. There is much to do and I am trying to choose wisely how I spend my time. I know that you, too, must have many demands on your energies and hours, but renewing your ties with our alma mater will prove most worthwhile. I urge you to attend any Mary Baldwin Chapter meeting in your area. You will learn firsthand what is happening at Mary Baldwin, will be in touch with other alumnae, and, I hope, will come away newly excited about our alma mater. And, I ask you to contact our alumnae who haven't been "in touch" for awhile and ask them to go with you.

One of my goals as President of the Alumnae Association is to see the number of active alumnae double; I need you to help accomplish this. Will you help me? If you are already active, do encourage others to participate as well. And if you're not, please join us. We have much to offer, but so do you, the more you give of yourself to the Alumnae Association, the better the Association can serve the College and the alumnae community.

In the years that I have been active in the Alumnae Association, we have tried hard to develop new programs and services. I am extremely excited about a new service which is now available to you. Through a special arrangement with Sovran Bank of Virginia, you can now have a Mary Baldwin MasterCard. The card has been designed exclusively for the Mary Baldwin Alumnae Association and offers some very special benefits.

There is no membership fee for the first year, and, in subsequent years, it will be only $18.00 annually. The Mary Baldwin MasterCard also has a low variable annual interest rate, which is currently 16.25%. This competitive rate is much lower than that charged by many other credit cards. The minimum credit line available is $1,500. Of course, you must meet the credit qualifications established by Sovran.

Each time you use your Mary Baldwin MasterCard you will help enhance the visibility of the College, telling the world that you attended Mary Baldwin. In addition, the Alumnae Association benefits each time you make a purchase using your Mary Baldwin MasterCard.

If you have not already received detailed information about the Mary Baldwin MasterCard, you will receive it in the mail soon. I encourage you to take advantage of this special new program, which benefits both you and the Alumnae Association. This is a easy, new way to support our College, and, of course it will be easy to do some Christmas shopping with the Virginia Sampler using your new Mary Baldwin MasterCard.

Mary Baldwin people have always been special people in their outreach and support of each other. I felt this when I visited in high school, I knew it firsthand as a college student, and I continue to feel now. I thank you.

Crista Cabe, the new Executive Director of the Alumnae Activities Office, began work on August 1. Three weeks later, as I interviewed her, I was pleased with how much she already knew about the Alumnae Association, and with how "at home" she seemed to be.

"You have to realize," she said, "that this is my home. I am a native of the Shenandoah Valley. Furthermore, I have known MBC faculty and alumnae for as long as I can remember and have always held a deep affection and respect for Mary Baldwin."

Crista claims Margaret and Fletcher Collins as a second set of parents and credits them with inspiring her interests in the arts and for establishing Mary Baldwin as a center for the cultural life of the area. She has been a part of that cultural life from an early age. When she was seven, she acted Roo in Winnie the Pooh, directed by Robbins Gates at Oak Grove. Later, Connie Atkins ('72) directed her in a play. As an adult, Crista worked with ShenanArts, a local cultural organization.

Crista graduated from William and Mary in 1982. She was an English major and was elected to both Phi Beta Kappa and Omicron Delta Kappa. She also holds an A.M. in English from the University of Chicago.

Crista's love of the theater landed her a job from 1984 to 1986 as Director of Audience Development with Court Theatre, a professional equity theater affiliated with the University of Chicago. That association led, in 1986, to her becoming Program Director in the Office of Alumni Relations at the University of Chicago. In this capacity she acted as chief liaison to 17,000 alumni, managing a large budget, planning and implementing reunion weekends, supervising volunteers and training them through workshops.

One of Crista's priorities is to meet as many alumnae as she can as quickly as she can. By the end of her first month she had met and worked with alumnae in Staunton, Richmond, Charlottesville, and Columbia, S.C. In early September, she visited alumnae in five cities in Texas. Obviously travel is taking a large part of her time during this first year.

As we talked about her philosophy of alumnae affairs, she said, "Alumnae are a major part of the College community and should be treated as such. They should be informed, their opinions should be asked, and their suggestions should be carefully considered. At the same time, they should be expected to pull their own weight."

As a means of increasing involvement of alumnae, she has begun looking at the constituencies we are now serving. She asks, "Why are we reaching some groups and not others? Which programs work and which do not?" Crista plans to keep the programs that are working and add new ones as needs arise.

Crista Cabe To Direct Alumnae Activities

She also plans to look at the structures of the chapters and their leadership. She wants to find ways of developing leadership so that one or two people do not have to do all the work, and she wants chapters to initiate programs they are interested in, not limiting activities solely to those the College asks them to do. "I believe that there are many ways for alumnae to be involved with the College besides simply attending chapter functions. One of my tasks will be to help to develop new ways of reaching alumnae who do not have a chapter in their area."

When I asked Crista about her response to her first three weeks on campus, she became very animated and enthusiastically described a number of observations: "I was impressed with the Alumnae Office and the personnel from the moment I walked in the door on August 1. Everyone has been warm and welcoming. The goals that President Tyson and John Rice, our Vice President for Institutional Advancement, have set forth are ones that I share. With their backing and the enthusiasm and the cooperation of the Alumnae Board, I think we will have exciting years."

Having talked with Crista for only a short time, I agree that there are exciting times ahead for the Alumnae Association under her leadership.

Crista, welcome home.

Nine legacies, all members of the brand new Class of 1992, were honored, along with their alumnae relatives, at a luncheon on September 1. President Tyson and the Alumnae Office staff were on hand to welcome the new students and families. The porch of the Alumnae House was the perfect spot for those who attended to enjoy a break from unpacking; festive decorations in the class colors — yellow and purple — added to the cheery, relaxed atmosphere, and each new student was given an African violet — of course, a purple one — to take back to her dormitory room.

Legacies who came to the luncheon were Jill Balfour of Richmond, daughter of Jane Coleman Balfour '62; Beth Bowles of Oakton, daughter of Barbara Brown Bowles '68; Lauren Gantly of Sands Point, N.Y., daughter of Susan Mulford Gantly '66; Merritt Gibbons of Paris, Texas, daughter of Judy Merritt Gibbons; Nancy Cornelia Thackston of Charlotte,

Virginia L. Lester Scholarship

In 1985, the Alumnae Association instituted the Virginia L. Lester Scholarship in honor of the service and leadership of the seventh President of Mary Baldwin College. This $2,500 scholarship was established from the proceeds of the very first promotion of the Virginia Sampler Project of the Alumnae Association. Awarded annually, this scholarship is presented to a student who is an alumna legacy and who has demonstrated academic excellence and strong leadership abilities.

Emilie Jo Mehrtens became the fourth recipient of the Lester Scholarship during Homecoming/Commencement '88 Weekend. Emilie is the daughter of Melio Ja Hook '48. "I was truly honored to receive this scholarship and feel that it was also an honor for my mother," said Emilie.

A rising senior and psychology major, Emilie finds the area of child psychology fascinating. She plans to supplement her psychology studies by earning teacher's certification. Future plans include working with nursery school or elementary school children.

She maintains an outstanding academic record while holding two jobs which help to support her education. During the academic year, she works as a student assistant in the Registrar's Office, where she is highly regarded. She also works off-campus as a waitress at Country Cookin' Restaurant. She spent the summer working at King's Dominion in the cash control/accounting department.

Emilie has a passion for music. She is a trombonist and is a member of the Staunton Stonewall Brigade Band and the Waynesboro Players Musical Ensemble. She is also a former member of the Mary Baldwin choir.

Emilie represents the continuing tradition of excellence among our students and alumnae.

CHAPTERS IN ACTION

Baltimore

The Baltimore Alumnae Chapter hosted a picnic and silent auction in June at the home of Sara Paulston Tompkins '81.

Charleston, West Virginia

Charleston alumnae attended a luncheon with Dr. John T. Rice, Vice-President of Institutional Advancement and Carroll Oliver Roach '84, director of Chapter Development at the Edgewood Country Club. This event was hosted by Peggy Herscher Hitchman '40.

Charlotte

In July, the Charlotte Alumnae Chapter hosted a summer social at the home of Mary Shuford '83 with Carroll Oliver Roach '84.

Mary Wray Wiggins '81, Ann Lewis '53, and Mary Shuford '83 enjoy themselves at the Charlotte Alumnae Chapter party.

Charlottesville

In August, the Charlottesville Alumnae Chapter held a planning meeting and dinner with Carroll Oliver Roach '84 to discuss plans for the 1988-89 year.

Columbia

The Columbia Alumnae Chapter hosted a cocktail party in honor of the new Executive Director of Alumnae Activities, Cristo R. Cabe, and the Executive Committee of the Alumnae Board. Alumnae Association President, Anita Thee Graham '50, and her husband, Jimmy, hosted this August event. Also attending were Carroll Oliver Roach '84 and Katherine Lichtenburg, Director of Alumnae Admissions.

Kansas City

Kansas City alumnae and friends gathered in June for a cocktail party at the home of former parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Oliver. Attending from the College was Carroll Oliver Roach '84. Zoe Kerbey Holmes '70 helped organize this event.

REPORT

A MESSAGE FROM DR. CYNTHIA H. TYSON

As a record 278 new students begin their fall classes here at Mary Baldwin, I pause to salute you, the supporters of the College, for being instrumental in our success. Your contributions to the 1987-88 Annual Fund, detailed in the pages that follow, are gifts that build. Every corner of the campus has been touched by the Annual Fund: faculty salaries and development, computer equipment, library facilities and acquisitions, laboratory and athletic equipment are enhanced by your generosity.

And truly generous you have been! The 1987-88 Annual Fund report that follows demonstrates the special feelings that Mary Baldwin's alumnae and friends have for this extraordinary place. This year has brought continued progress to Mary Baldwin, as well as record contributions.

The 1987-88 academic year was remarkable for the many successes and national recognition the College achieved. The Annual Fund also celebrates a parallel success story. However, as we stand poised for the Sesqui-centennial Celebration in 1992, we must not look only to the past for inspiration and pride. Indeed, the next 150 years may be the finest for Mary Baldwin with your continued support.

Because 1988-89 is an important year for Mary Baldwin, we have created a National Committee for the Annual Fund headed by Dr. Thomas H. and Dean Martha S. Grafton. I am pleased to have such able leadership in place to guide the Annual Fund. I am certain that next year's report will continue to show the growth that this College merits and will need to meet current and future challenges.

Thank you again for your support, and for your gift that builds not only growth, but also quality.

Sincerely,
Cynthia H. Tyson

ANNUAL FUND AWARDS

These prestigious awards recognize and acknowledge our alumnae's broad support for Mary Baldwin College's future growth. The awards are presented each year during Homecoming, and are named in honor of past presidents of Mary Baldwin College. Accepting the awards on behalf of their respective classes, class delegates represent their peers during the National Alumnae Association Meeting. The most important group influencing the future progress of Mary Baldwin College is our alumnae, and the College acknowledges their steadfast support with the deepest gratitude. The leaders listed below are acknowledged for their outstanding friendship to the College.

The Fraser Bowl
Class of 1943

Awarded to the class presenting the largest gift to the 1987-1988 Annual Fund, the Class of 1943 secured the Bowl by contributing $38,259 to the Annual Fund.

The Jarman Cup
Class of 1930

An outstanding 73% of the Class of 1930 contributed to the Annual Fund this past year, thereby assuring the awarding of the Cup. The Jarman Cup is annually presented to the class demonstrating the highest level of class participation in the Annual Fund.

The Lewis Platter
Class of 1969

Congratulations go to the Class of 1969 for their outstanding increase of $20,161 in giving to the Annual Fund.

The Spencer Pitcher
Classes of 1981 and 1982

A most important Annual Fund goal is to increase alumnae participation in the yearly campaign of the College. The Pitcher is bestowed on the class obtaining the greatest percentage increase in participation, and the Classes of 1981 and 1982 tied for the largest percent increase in participation at 13%. These classes are acknowledged with pride!

Reunion Class Gifts

Traditionally, classes celebrating their 10th, 25th or 50th reunions have presented special gifts to the College. The Classes of 1938, 1963 and 1978 are hereby gratefully acknowledged for their extraordinary participation in a program benefiting the College community.

Class Fund Representative Program

In its third year, the Class Fund Representative program is providing a more personal way of encouraging alumnae to respond to the College's annual financial needs. The important work of the Class Fund Representatives touches every person and aspect of Mary Baldwin College, and their efforts are sincerely appreciated. Their names are highlighted in the Alumnae Honor Roll.

THE HONOR ROLL

Alumnae contributors to the 1987-1988 Annual Fund are listed below according to class year. The College community thanks each of these important benefactors for their investment in Mary Baldwin College's future.

SENIOR GIFT SOCIETY

Instituted by the Class of 1978, the Senior Gift Society is composed of all members of graduating classes who support a project in the form of gifts to Mary Baldwin College. Members of each senior class decide upon the form of their class gift. The Classes of 1978, 1979, 1980, 1982 and 1983 established ongoing funds to which they contribute yearly. The Classes of 1981, 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987 chose to support the current Annual Fund. The Class of 1988 contributed two gifts to the College: a seating area on Cannon Hill to be used for rest and contemplation by students and visitors to Mary Baldwin, as well as a contribution of $529.05 to the 1987-88 Annual Fund. The entire senior class is to be congratulated, but especially Tiffany Bevan, chair of the Senior Gift committee and the following committee members:

Ralphetta Aker
Carol Barnett
Marnie Clements
Laura Harwell
Barb Weeks
Julie Seavor
Joanne Richards
Connie Pair
Mary Hess King
Margaret Mullens
Kim Quezada
Louise Harrell
Anne Holland
Joelle Keith

The College is appreciative of the Senior Classes' demonstration of caring and commitment to Mary Baldwin College's success.

CHURCHES

Mary Baldwin College was founded in 1842 with the strong support of the Presbyterian Church, and this bond continues today. Individual churches and the Synod of the Mid-Atlantic contribute to educational progress through their relationship with the College. Many thanks to these churches for their foresight.

VIRGINIA FOUNDATION FOR INDEPENDENT COLLEGES

Annual Fund support is given to the College by the Virginia Foundation for Independent Colleges (VFIC), a cooperative effort by fourteen of Virginia's private colleges and many outstanding leaders of the business community.

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88
VFIC	$139,090	$148,601	$158,666

FOUNDATIONS AND CORPORATIONS

Mary Baldwin College appreciates the level of support provided by the business community, which contributed an outstanding $244,497.76 to the important work of the College. Our gratitude is extended to these generous patrons.

In addition to national corporate support, Mary Baldwin College has had the benefit of local support as well through the Valley Area Business and Professional Campaign (VACPC). Under the leadership of VACPC chair William J. McIntyre, Jr. of the Staunton Insurance Agency, this program raised $21,447 for Mary Baldwin this year. In addition to immediate community and area support, VACPC activities have also promoted public relations and communication between Mary Baldwin and area corporations.

Summer Science Program Highly Rated by Participants

"When you complete this program you will say two things. You will say, 'This has been the greatest program in which I've ever been involved,' and, 'If it goes on one more day, I'll die!'"

These were the words Dr. James Patrick, the director of the Young Women In Science Program, used to prepare this year's 36 participants for what lay ahead — three weeks of intense laboratory work designed to challenge, stimulate, and enrich the program's extraordinary young participants.

Every secondary school in the state of Virginia was invited to nominate one rising female senior to compete for a spot in the program. The YWIS faculty received over 100 applications, out of which 36 students were selected. These 36 students were judged to be the best qualified and to be those who would benefit most from the program. Those selected are not only outstanding students of science, but have exceptional academic records in all areas of study. According to Dr. Lundy Pentz, an instructor in the program, all of the students selected for this year's program are "'A' students who make an occasional 'B' and have scored above 1100 on the SAT." This year's participants are described by Dr. Patrick as being "highly intelligent, motivated, pleasant, appreciative, and anxious to learn."

These remarkable students with diverse personalities and interests come from all over Virginia. Their hobbies include music, theater, and sports, as well as reading and writing poetry and short stories. Most expect to pursue a college education with a particular emphasis on the sciences, but others, like Mary Mavor of Waverly, who wants to study business, hope to major in other fields of interest.

Whatever their interests, all of the students were outspoken about their enthusiasm for YWIS. Most came prepared to do nothing but homework and study, but soon found out that most of their study time would be spent in the laboratory. "I thought there would be more work to do," said Carla Martin of Lynchburg. "I was sure my nights would be spent reading and doing homework."

Saroj Sheshadri of Wise agrees. "We spend most of the time learning lab techniques. It really is hard, but we have a lot of free time to relax and socialize. It's great!"

Usually, a day at YWIS would begin with Dr. Jones' class piling into vans and heading for a nearby national forest to mark out pieces of land and then examine every living thing in them. Dr. Pentz's Microbiology class would be busy identifying the bacteria that live in the dining hall's macaroni salad or on the bottom of a student's shoe. Dr. Patrick's Organic Chemistry class would be trying to clear the air after the fractionation of turpentine or the isolation of citral from lemon grass oil by steam distillation.

In addition to the enriching laboratory experience, YWIS participants enjoyed the opportunity to meet new people and have at least a taste of college life. Each student was assigned a roommate, and the whole group gathered in the evenings to watch movies or take walks around the campus or to the nearby 7-11. The group counselors, Betsy Hopeman, Katie Reagan, Tiffany Hamm, Vicki Everton, and Anne Byford, all rising seniors at Mary Baldwin, functioned not only as advisors and lab assistants, but also made sure there was always something for the students to do to relax. The counselors rented movies for the students, organized cookouts, took them to Sherando Lake, and were responsible for more than one trip to the Staunton Mall. One of the counselors, Anne Byford, even organized a fencing class in which four of the students participated.

"The counselors are great," remarked Laura Gaines of Annandale. "Everyone here is wonderful. They really assigned the roommates well, too. It's eerie how much my roommate and I have in common. Our prom dates are even going to the same college."

"I was sure that there would be no social life, but there's never a dull moment." Interestingly enough, the participants unanimously agreed that a nearby Young Men In Science program is definitely needed.

Long a leader in the education and enrichment of gifted students, Mary Baldwin College is well qualified to meet the challenge of designing a program for these remarkable students. In 1973, Dr. William Kelly, then president of Mary Baldwin, led the movement for the establishment of the Virginia Governor's School for the Gifted. Mary Baldwin's faculty also designed the first chemistry curriculum taught by the Governor's School. And, Mary Baldwin is the home of the innovative Program for the Exceptionally Gifted, PEG. In 1978, Mary Baldwin created the Special Summer Science Program which was independent of The Governor's School.

The YWIS program was begun in 1985 as a revised, tuition-free version of the Special Summer Science Program. YWIS offers students three courses: Organic Chemistry of Natural Products, taught by Dr. Patrick; Field Biology, taught by Dr. Eric Jones; and a course in Microbiology taught by Dr. Lundy H. Pentz. Students take two of the three courses and receive two hours of college credit for each successfully completed class. The program's goal is to give the students an opportunity to explore an education in science that is unlikely to be offered in a secondary school. Instead of being taught in the traditional classroom setting, students "learn by doing" in the laboratory. It is this "hands on" approach that not only teaches students, but also allows the students to teach themselves.

Mary Baldwin benefits from the YWIS program by exposing some of the most outstanding female students in Virginia to all that Mary Baldwin has to offer. These students interact with Mary Baldwin faculty and students and are able to experience the MBC social life in an informal way.

The participants' reactions to the program seem to be nothing but positive. Most agreed they had covered a tremendous amount of material in three weeks. They agreed, too, that the experience was decidedly different from high school science classes. "I took honors biology in high school," said Sarah Sargent of Hamilton, "We never did anything like this."

In the end students and counselors alike knew that Dr. Patrick had been right all along: YWIS was the greatest program in which they had ever been involved, but one more day of it would have killed them.

Coming To America

*Six magical weeks
acquaint Japanese students with the West.*

For six weeks in July and August, 27 students from Tokyo, all of whom have chosen to attend schools in the United States, were given a crash course in American culture. These students were taught everything from rudimentary English to the complexities of the social, economic, and political systems of the United States.

The program, called Cultural Immersion, was developed by Lewis Askegaard, College Registrar, and Donald Wells, the Director of Continuing Education, in conjunction with the Sakae Institute in Tokyo. The objective, according to Dudley Luck, the director of the program, is to familiarize the students with the United States and help them to avoid or better deal with any "culture shock" they might experience. "Our goal," explains Mrs. Luck, "is to help these students adjust to American college and culture through the English language and discipline."

Adjusting, however, was not an easy process. The students had a hard time at first just getting used to American food and to the 13-hour time difference between Japan and the eastern United States. "They suffered from jet lag for a week," said Mrs. Luck, "and they kept asking for Japanese rice and soy sauce."

Becoming familiar with the English language also proved to be a difficult task. Although the program included an English class, two of the students required additional lessons at Stuart

Hall in Staunton. The students were allowed to speak Japanese only at lunch, and anyone caught speaking it at any other time was fined two dollars. (The fine money was put into a jar and used for a party when the program was completed.) However difficult the language barrier was to cross in the beginning, after just two weeks everyone noticed a marked improvement in how well the students could communicate in English.

"My English is much better," said 20-year-old Musaku Oi. "We can speak well, but the biggest improvement has been in how much we understand when others speak."

In addition to the English class, which ran throughout the entire six weeks, students attended six other classes: political science, taught by Dr. Mar Cole; American history, taught by Dr. Patrick Menk; sociology, taught by Bernard Levin; religion, taught by Dr. Roderic Owen; economics, taught by Dr. Jane Pietrowski; and a class of study skills, taught by Judy Kilpatrick, the associate director of the program. Each of these classes lasted one week.

To enhance what the students were learning in the classroom, several field trips were organized. During the political science class, the students visited Washington, D.C., Staunton's General District Court, and attended a meeting of Staunton's city council. The American history class visited Monticello and the University of Virginia. The students also travelled to Richmond to tour the Federal Reserve, and to Staunton's correctional facility. Many recreational trips were planned as well. The students visited Busch Gardens while they were in Williamsburg, and went to see a play, "Possessed For Romance," at the Wayside Theater in Middletown, Virginia. The students seemed to agree that the field trips reinforced what they were learning about America in the classroom and better enabled them to relate to the culture of this country.

"I saw so many things that I had heard about and always wanted to see," said 18 year old Eri Segura. "Washington was great." Miss Segura is one of the three students involved in the Cultural Immersion program who will attend Stuart Hall in the fall. "My father studied at Yale University," she explained, "so I had heard much about this country. I had always wanted to come here, and I am glad I have the chance."

The students were involved in many extracurricular activities designed to acclimate them to American college life and to enable them to relate better to typical Americans. Students organized picnics, dorm parties, and volleyball games. The Japanese students also participated in cookouts with the students from the Young Women Exchange program, and had numerous opportunities to interact with American people.

Prior to their experience in the Cultural Immersion Program, most of the Japanese students thought of Americans as being tremendously outgoing, and some feared that the Japanese people were not well liked in this country. Many of us were afraid of prejudice in this country," remarked Yuka Asada, "but Americans are friendlier than we thought they were. I am not afraid of them anymore."

The program's success could not have been possible were it not for the four individuals who functioned as the group's counselors. Three Mary Baldwin students, Pam Ammermann '91, Ginger Scott '91, and Claire Nunis '89, and the graduate of James Madison University, Brian Walker, served, according to Mrs. Luck, "confidants, disciplinarians, tutors, and group counsellors."

The counselors were selected by Judy Kilpatrick for their maturity and responsibility, as well as their ability to relate to persons of a different culture. The three Mary Baldwin students each had at least three semesters of Japanese, and all had experience in international studies. They're the 'glue' of the program," says Mrs. Luck. "They hold the program together."

The group counselors held nightly discussions with the students. During this time, they talked about the students' experiences with them, and were able to judge how well they were adjusting to the new environment.

"We talked about everything," said counselor Ginger Scott. "They had a hard time at first because their expectations of Americans were so high. Some of them felt that they had to be outgoing and friendly in order to fit in here. We also talked a lot about dating. Some of them had never been out on a date before and we wanted to get them used to the social life in this country."

According to Claire Nunis, all of the counselors thoroughly enjoyed the responsibility that came with the job: "We've all enjoyed the program, though the first week was so hectic, we all wanted to quit. Now we all wish it could go on for twelve weeks, instead of just six."

"I've never been in a position where so much was demanded of me," said Brian Walker, "but this experience has been invaluable."

All in all, the Cultural Immersion program has been a tremendous success. Most of the students feel confident that they will be entering their respective schools in the fall with a better understanding of the people and culture of the United States.

"I am so glad I came," said 20-year old Hideo Takada. Ms. Takada will attend Green Mountain College in Vermont in the fall, and plans eventually to manage a hotel in the United States. "I feel I can succeed in an American college. It will be extremely difficult, but this program has helped me very much. I know I can do it." ▲

MBC Faculty Still Serious Students

college years. Now in the third year of the second grant, each college contributes $37,500 over the five years to match the Mellon grant. Each college also receives a one-time $8,000 fund to conduct on-campus faculty development programs.

For the past two years the seminars have been held at the College of William and Mary. Prior to this, they took place at the University of Richmond. Though the location has changed the general concept has remained nearly the same in that each of the six colleges may send nine faculty members, who may each choose course from four offerings. Participants receive room and board and a stipend. Planning for the 1988 Program was directed by Dr. Frank S. Murray, professor of Psychology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, assisted by Dr. Kay Broschar, professor of Sociology at Hollins, and a board made up of coordinators from each of the six colleges. This year, representatives from Washington College in Chestertown, Maryland and Centre College in Danville, Kentucky, were sent as observers.

The four seminars, each led by an expert on the topic, addressed issues beyond the boundaries of individual academic discipline. Dr. Ralph Johnson, professor of Philosophy at the University of Windsor, Ontario, Canada, has taught more than thirty seminars in the past three years on the topics of reasoning and critical thinking — critical thinking being the antithesis of rote learning, which is quickly forgotten. He attributed increasing interest in the subject to the desire of teachers at all levels to improve the students' reasoning capacities. Dr. Johnson spoke highly of the seminar's participants. "They are serious students who know how to enjoy a lively discussion. I've been struck by the great sense of cooperation here. I wish Canada had a program like this for college faculty."

Dr. Verna Case of Davidson College taught a class called "Technology's Children." In this group, she led faculty to understand recent

The College of William and Mary is accustomed to students who engage in debate against the 18th-century Colonial Williamsburg backdrop on topics of 21st century concepts and technology. From June 13th through 23rd, 1988, the students were selected faculty from six of Virginia's independent colleges. They lived in dormitories, ate in the cafeteria, and shared stimulating discussions in seminars as well as more informal conversations with colleagues from other academic institutions.

In 1981, six colleges in Virginia — Hampden-Sydney, Hollins, Mary Baldwin, Randolph-Macon, Randolph-Macon Woman's College, and Sweet Briar — received a four-year grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation to support a cooperative program to improve teaching and learning. The focus was on faculty intellectual development. Hampden-Sydney College, which is responsible for the financial and administrative management of the grant, invested the fund so successfully that an additional year was added to the original grant.

In 1985, the six colleges requested from the Mellon Foundation another matching grant of $225,000 for another five years. During this funding period, the colleges would concentrate on topics related to student development in the breakthroughs in reproductive technology, the impact of these breakthroughs, and the issues — ethical, legal, economic, psychological, etc. — resulting from the application of technology. Speaking of her group, she said, "They absorbed the reading, worked hard to understand the concepts, and probed deeply into the issues involved."

A seminar entitled "Assessment of the Impact of Liberation Theology on the Third World" was led by Dr. John R. Pottenger who teaches at the University of Alabama in Huntsville. Dr. Pottenger defined liberation theology as a theological reflection on poverty and oppression. Using Nicaragua as his emphasis, he wanted his group to learn about religion-inspired political movements throughout the Third World that are challenging the fundamental relationships — political, military, and economic — between the United States and these countries.

Dr. Mary Poovey of Johns Hopkins University taught a seminar entitled "Contemporary Issues in Criticism and Theory." Her primary goal was to help participants understand what it means when one says that our vision of reality is a consequence of the way something is represented. She said, "I teach the way in which a culture creates its own reality. We address such questions as 'Who creates that reality? For what purpose?' For example, when people read a Dickens novel, they assume that it can be cut off from the context of Victorian England. I want people to be aware of their assumptions when they interpret literature in this way."

The program is designed as an intensive learning experience for faculty who in turn become more productive teachers in their own colleges. Those who volunteered almost two weeks of their summer to share this experience expressed deep appreciation for the opportunity to broaden their own knowledge while sharing ideas with colleagues.

Lisa Stockdale-Klaus (Mary Baldwin, English) said, "This has been my first experience at a Mellon Program and it has been overwhelmingly positive. The seminar itself was of graduate-level intensity; each topic was timely and provocative, and the leaders were very well prepared. In 'Criticism and Theory' we read two articles which have not yet been published — it was exciting to be on the cutting edge of contemporary scholarship. The program also offers a successful social experience. Learning alongside faculty from other institutions and in other disciplines definitely enhances one's sense of the scholarly community. We have been able to exchange ideas over dinner and in many informal settings."

Observers Dr. Peter Tapke (Philosophy, Washington College) and Dr. Dorothy Nelms (English, Centre College) noted comments overheard about the difficulties participants experienced in switching roles from that of faculty to student. According to their observations, students found that reading assignments were often difficult and powers of concentration were strained during lengthy class discussions. A few people reported experiencing sudden empathy with their own college students when preparing oral reports. Living in a dormitory, for some, caused hints of claustrophobia. Best intentions to be fully prepared for class occasionally fell short. As one participant said: "When the weekend was over and I hadn't quite finished my reading, I had a total recall of those queasy 'Sunday night' feelings of student days."

Another person said, "I learned anew to appreciate the problems and frustrations students encounter when they try to master a new subject or difficult concept." Even these experiences were seen as positive, however, since effective teaching implies understanding of one's students.

The temperature hovered close to 100 degrees on June 23rd when the faculty packed bags, said goodbye to new friends from other colleges, and headed for home. David T. Mason (Mary Baldwin, Political Science) summed up the general response to the 1988 Mellon Program: "The Mellon Program was a profoundly stimulating and richly rewarding experience. I was particularly impressed by the level of participation, quality of discussions, and thoroughness of preparation by all concerned. It was a true collegial learning experience. My heartfelt thanks to a distinguished group of excellent program organizers, accomplished seminar leaders, and intellectually vital and sensitive faculty participants."

Theodosia Ehle:

Her Favorite Rags to Riches Story

At age 10, Theodosia Ehle was a young girl attending Mary Baldwin Seminary. Her father, Shelton Porter Mann, was a merchant in Staunton. Her mother, Isabel Jane Hamilton, and grandmother had attended Mary Baldwin. "My family was one of great believers in education," she says. One of her clearest memories is watching the boys from Staunton Military Academy travel up and down the hill. "A teacher caught me looking out the window, so I was punished by having to stay in the infirmary for two weeks," she says.

Ms. Ehle attended the George School in Pennsylvania and the College of William and Mary. Eventually, though, she returned to Mary Baldwin and graduated in 1937 with a science major. Later, Ms. Ehle bought Oak Manor Farm, whose 100 acres was home to Mary Baldwin's riding program, of which she was the director. The program was discontinued at the close of the 1987-88 academic year when Ms. Ehle retired.

Ms. Ehle says she is her own favorite "rags to riches" story: Early in 1952, she began teaching riding to help support herself and two young children. "I was recently divorced and had o money, so I decided to teach riding for a dollar a session."

With growing confidence, Ms. Ehle began to realize she was a talented teacher. She went to Stuart Hall and arranged to teach riding there, gathering eight horses for her eight students. She transported students to and from Fort Denunce in an old station wagon, and fed and cared for the horses, all the while managing to survive as a single parent. Ms. Ehle remembers, "I continued this rat race for several years. Then I hired a rickety old second-hand bus and paid a driver. It was a great relief not to have to drive."

Although Ms. Ehle has ridden all her life, she eventually changed her whole way of riding and teaching through formal instruction with Captain Vladimir Littauer, author of a textbook that she had used as a guide for many years. She has continued to teach according to Captain Littauer's philosophy and method of non-abuse and cooperation with the horse.

In 1961, the State of Virginia presented Ms. Ehle with a new challenge which she tackled with characteristic grit and determination. She says, "The state wanted to put Interstate 81 through my farm and offered me $18,000. I decided to sue for $67,000, its actual value, and I won the case. The money was divided among members of my family, so with my share I bought Oak Manor in Burkettown. At the time, it was just a decayed farm with an old cattle barn. It was a two-year transition from one place to another — the state had even removed all the fences. In 1963, I moved the horses in. You can imagine the hassle." For the next ten years, while renovations and improvements continued to be made to the property, the program was expanded to include a summer camp, among other things Ms. Ehle became an adjunct instructor for Mary Baldwin, and she also developed Oak Manor into a nationally recognized and accredited school for teachers and riders.

Ms. Ehle credits Gwen Walsh, "my dedicated and dear friend," with helping her overcome some of the obstacles to development of Mary Baldwin's riding program. She says, "There were three major problems: we were off campus, we had no indoor ring, and no transportation. Together, and with the help of many others, we made the program work. Also, Martha Grafton, who was instrumental in initiating change at the college, really helped solve the problems as they came along."

In July of 1973, with 43 young students enrolled in Oak Manor Equestrian School and Camp, Ms. Ehle was confronted by a major crisis. The newly restored barn was set on fire and destroyed. "It was a rather bleak day," says Ms. Ehle. "I don't know where I got the courage to continue. I had 43 children, horses and counselors to take care of, and my barn had just burned down. After finishing with camp, I had to continue to teach the Stuart Hall and Mary Baldwin girls. This was a dilly . . . it rained all fall and winter. With no barn the Mary Baldwin girls and I had to work outdoors, and I'm paying for that now with poor health. But we survived."

The truth is, Ms. Ehle not only survived, but triumphed. She has raised and trained championship horses including Oliver Twist, one of the best open jumpers in the United States today. For her service to Glenmore Hunt in Staunton, Ms. Ehle was offered and accepted a coveted life membership in National Masters of Fox Hounds. She was also honored by Who's Who in Virginia.

In addition to providing instruction for Mary Baldwin's students, Ms. Ehle was associated with other area colleges for a number of years. Her positions included varsity coach and head of the riding department for James Madison University, and she was the head of the riding department for Bridgewater College. After several years, she decided to offer instruction through Mary Baldwin College exclusively, a decision which reflects her devotion to the College.

Although Ms. Ehle's decision to retire from Mary Baldwin was a difficult one, she welcomes the change. "Now I want to continue to raise and sell horses without the pressure of teaching," she says. "I thought about selling the farm, but it would be an awful struggle to move. I'm going to stay and raise beautiful colts."

"Besides," she notes, "times have changed. Students have more freedom and choices than ever before. Now they can go to W. & L. for the weekend rather than ride horses. I think this freedom is good — the girls don't get punished like I did for watching boys."

Ms. Ehle sees her retirement festivities as celebration of the accomplishment of a career that combined work with personal interest. She says, "This retirement is a highlight of my life. It shows I'm appreciated." She has been honored with gifts and a series of receptions, two hosted by alumnae and one by the President. ▲

Karen Whitt '88 Wins NCAA Award

Karen Whitt, who graduated from Mary Baldwin last spring, has been awarded the Arthur Ashe Tennis Sportsmanship Award. Ms. Whitt, from Harrisonburg, was nominated by the College's tennis coach, Lois Blackburn, who described Karen as "sincere, honest in every instance, conscientious in her academic work and in her tennis."

Karen, who was also nominated to be the Volvo Tennis Senior Player of the Year, was selected by collegiate coaches from across the United States after being one of four players chosen from a long list of nationwide nominations. The award was presented to her at ceremonies for the Division III NCAA Championship and was based on "tennis skills and sportsmanship, scholastic and extra-curricular activities and humanitarian concern and accomplishments."

Ms. Whitt was honored by her teammates, as well, who voted her the most dedicated player for 1987-1988. Described as a strong team leader, Karen served as role model for Mary Baldwin's other tennis players.

Karen, who has worked at children's tennis clinics and was a member of the Hospital Auxiliary, transferred from Mary Washington College as a sophomore. An economics major at Mary Baldwin, she is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Whitt.

Information about Karen Whitt's award was obtained from an article by Kendall Blair Simms that appeared in Campus Comments, Mary Baldwin's student newspaper.

MARY BALDWIN COLLEGE INTERNATIONAL

TRAVEL STUDY

PROGRAM

Mary Baldwin College is pleased to announce its International Travel Study Program for 1988-1989. The tours have been developed by Mary Baldwin's Office of Continuing Education to give you the most memorable travel experiences possible at the lowest possible costs.

Each tour in the program is designed not only to offer you the excitement of travel, but also to enable you to become part of a unique learning experience. Accompanying each tour will be a carefully selected traveling faculty — experts who will add new dimensions to your adventure by sharing their knowledge of cities and countries, people, cultures and even food and entertainment.

Our groups of twenty to forty adults are usually based in a city for three to five nights. All accommodations for lodging are in first class or superior tourist class hotels with continental or buffet breakfasts. Rest assured that we have built ample free time into the schedule.

WHAT IS INCLUDED:

The Barbara Shuler Mayo Scholarship

Members of the Mary Baldwin College Biology Department have established the Barbara Shuler Mayo Scholarship in honor of a gifted colleague, friend, and alumna of Mary Baldwin, Class of 1967, who died May 25, 1988.

In July, the Center for Coastal Studies in Provincetown, Massachusetts, informed the College of the decision of its Board of Directors to establish the Barbara Mayo Internship in Conservation Sciences, available each summer to an undergraduate in the biological sciences.

Donations to the Barbara Shuler Mayo Scholarship fund are invited. For information on establishing scholarships, endowed chairs, or estate planning, contact R. Eric Staley, Executive Director of Development and College Relations.

In Our View Barbara Mayo

*"The weatherman says clear today.
He doesn't know you've gone away."*
— Buddy Holly and the Crickets

Barbara Mayo — scientist, environmentalist, wife and mother, community leader — died this week of breast cancer.

During her life in Provincetown, Barbara Mayo profoundly affected Cape Cod and Cape Codders — from large agencies to small people. She was comfortable on the clam flats, with jeans wet at the knees, the wind whipping her hair and the scarf intended to secure that hair — and was equally comfortable wearing pearls to an appointment with the governor.

Her Florida upbringing never left her speech pattern, though this 43-year-old woman lived most of her adult life on Cape Cod. Her dedication to living a conscious and conscientious life was total, according to friends and co-workers; she would (or could) not separate ethics from science, fun from responsibility, learning from teaching. She set a committed example of simultaneous involvement that has left dozens of townspeople feeling hollow and empty this week.

Like most small towns, Provincetown functions politically because people set aside time from their homes and worklife to take care of the thousands of social tasks required in making a town into a hometown. Barbara Mayo managed scores of activities with responsibility. She always did her homework. She equated social and scientific values. She was consistent and inspiring.

A Ph.D. in marine biology — and a founder of the Center for Coastal Studies — she shared gardening travails with friends and neighbors, sang in her Episcopal church choir, played with her kids. A trained scientist, much of her last years were spent in understanding attitudinal healing and holistic health. She shared what she'd learned about stress, about watersheds, about people, about fishing, with everyone around her. Gracefully.

Barbara Mayo's passing is in the papers, on the radio, and in the conversations and faces of Provincetonians. Losing her to breast cancer has stopped the town in its emotional tracks.
